JOB OPENING AT PENN POSITIVE PSYCHOLOGY CENTER

There is a full time job opening for a project manager position for Penn Resilience Programs at the University of Pennsylvania’s Positive Psychology Center, working with Dr. Karen Reivich, Dr. Martin Seligman, and Peter Schulman. The position starts summer 2016 and continues for at least two years. This is an excellent opportunity as a stepping stone for graduate school or a longer term position in our Center.

The resilience training programs are based largely on cognitive-behavioral techniques. Twenty years of federally-funded research has shown that our programs reduce depression and anxiety and increase well-being. We now deliver these programs to several populations, including K-12 school teachers, college faculty, U.S. Army soldiers, police officers, and a professional sports team, among others. Our programs use a train-the-trainer model in which individuals are taught how to deliver our resilience curricula to others.

Responsibilities entail planning and implementing these programs, including logistics coordination with the training site and program sponsor, assisting with material production (e.g., workbooks, PowerPoint presentations), and onsite program coordination. Applicants are expected to have excellent organizing and communication skills and be detail-oriented. A psychology background and research experience is preferred but not essential.

To apply, send the following to Margeaux Cannon at macannon@psych.upenn.edu
* Cover letter, resume, writing sample(s), and references with contact info
* Send above materials as soon as convenient, then send letters of recommendation when available, by email only
* Indicate when you are available to start.

See http://ppc.sas.upenn.edu/ for general information about our Center.